How do you see the impact of parliamentary election in May 2014 on decision-making process in EU toward Iran?

Personally I see no connection between the parliamentary elections in 2014 and the decision-making toward Iran. EU democratic principles and standard procedures will be followed, as for the elections as well as electing new members to the Iran delegation in the parliament.

The European Parliament has, however, little say in the context of European foreign policy. However, members of European parliament can demand explanation of particular foreign policy settings, as I've done even in the context of Iranian sanctions in the past. The foreign policy of the EU is formed in the Council, so the EU decision making process is dependent on the political orientation of EU's member states. The result of parliamentary elections will however provide a good illustration of possible future trends.
