

Sweden's Foreign Minister Carl Bildt (L) takes pictures with his mobile phone while Iranian Foreign Minister Mohammad Javad Zarif (R) watches during their press conference in Tehran on February 4, 2014

BEHROUZ MEHRI / AFP

Iran is a key-actor in the new multipolar world

Andrea Fais

Andrea Fais (Perugia, 1984) is an Italian journalist and foreign affairs analyst. He is contributor for Chinese daily tabloid "Global Times", Italian magazine of geopolitics "Eurasia" and Russian magazine "Journal of Eurasian Affairs".

Geneva agreements established with 1+5 group in November 2013 could represent a breakthrough in 21st century geopolitics. Thanks to his brilliant diplomacy, president Rouhani has reached the most important goal in recent Iranian foreign policy: the legitimacy of national nuclear program. The contemporary chaos in which Erdogan's Turkey and Morsi's Egypt collapsed during summer of 2013, after one year of political Sunni hyper-activism, created ideal conditions for Iran.

Thanks to Bashar al-Assad successful management of Syrian crisis, Axis of Resistance emerged as winner against US-Saudi-Qatari alliance giving Tehran a stronger credibility not only inside Shia community but also in the rest of Muslim world. Muslim Brotherhood and Fethullah Gülen's Hizmet were defeated and definitely lost all their plausibility in front of